Wampum

American Indians once made bands of shell beads in decorative patterns called „wampum“. The designs represented certain events and were used as gifts or as a currency for trade. During colonial times, European merchants also often traded for and with wampum, even amongst themselves.

In this game, players are merchants traveling to different villages in canoes, trading maize, tobacco, animal pelts, arms and fire-water in return for other wares or for wampum. The player with the most wampum at the end of the game wins.
